EVERYDAY WEAR: SPRING-SUMMER FALL-WINTER

SPOTLIGHT ON Dusty Attenborough

EX-TERNEUZEN MIDFIELDER GRACES NEWLY-FORMED ISERLOHN F.C.

Vice-Admiral. Friend. Philosopher. Lone wolf. Last month, these words were chosen by our premium readers to best describe the undaunting yet elusive blue-haired comrade of Yang Wenli. You've heard the rumors, and they're all true! After years of keeping a lid on his secret passion for football, Dusty "Duster" Attenborough has officially joined the Iserlohn F.C.!

And he isn't the first. The Rosenritter trio, poached during the winter transfer window, graced the already star-studded Iserlohn lineup with their presence as well! After so many of his friends bit the bullet of temptation, even an antisocial hermit like Dusty couldn't resist exploring the depths of his talents in a peaceful venue like this. When asked why he went on military leave, this is what he had to say to us:

"I never wanted to be a soldier in the first place." After swiftly catching himself off-guard with his raw bluntness, Attenborough firmly gripped onto the rusty key hanging around his neck. "Oh, what I meant was··· the soldier's life should be reserved for hotheads like Poplan, right? Or tactical geniuses like Wen-li. Yet here they are! Slackers... give underperformers like me a break!" Standing in stark contrast to his own self-condemnation, the scoreboard for Iserlohn F.C. 's latest practice game against the Odin Sparrows read: 5 - 2. With Dusty scoring three of those goals. When confronted by this fact he quickly grew flustered, running to the locker room. He had the mannerisms of a child.

Hello Autumn!
With love, from Heinessen
@yingsael

This photo here is one from early this morning and probably is one of my favorites taken so far. I woke up a bit earlier than Yang, nothing new, to get the fire and breakfast ready. Though this time I gave myself a bit more time to set up the camera on a timer so I could catch the both of us together and to get a good shot of Yang pulling himself out of the tent. It was nothing new to me but after about two days of camping I was able to figure out his tempo. He rustles about an hour or so before sunrise, and eventually pulls himself out of the tent. He's always a bit fatigued, and blames it on his old age. But I think it's more the slight hangover he's always nursing. He thinks I haven't picked up on the fact he's hiding his brandy in his flask but I noticed after the second day when he could barely keep up on this trail we were climbing. Explains why he was always needing to borrow from my canteen. It's a good thing I brought a spare and made sure to keep it topped off. I couldn't help but laugh as I saw him poke his head out, his hair messy and voice a bit hoarse. Reminds me of when I still lived in his home always having to coax him out of bed. I handed him the spare canteen which I think I saw him try and take a whiff from, probably hoping it was more brandy.

He took a few gulps and complained how it should be illegal for admirals to have to walk so much. I said that maybe so if you were ordered to. But volunteering implies something else. Inevitably this led to a short philosophical debate, with numerous historical anecdotes from Yang. I didn't mind it too much since the talking at least helped him wake up a bit more, along with the smell of the eggs and sausage eventually coaxed him out of the tent completely. We ate and chatted a bit more, mostly about my enlistment so far and the training I've undergone. I wonder if I upset Yang sometimes when I bring up my experiences so far. Well, reminding him of the kind of life I've decided to go down and the risks it brings. Still, I think I can sense it in him as well, a sort of closer camaraderie even with our disparity in experience. I tried to push the thought away while we talked. It sort of distracted me as he brought up something from 100 years ago regarding something I reminded him of. I figured I would save it for the hiking we would do later.

I instead brought up some of the stuff I've been reading about Mountain Warfare and how that training still continues, and even how divisions exist! He seemed impressed, and said how he never gave it much thought but knew of the concept. I explained how some of the training and combat history of the Rosen Ritter is very similar to elite types of troops from old Earth and how those traditions still persist to this day. Curiously, the styles of combat of both the Empire and the FPA follow certain nations from old Earth. Namely a country known as Germany, with combat units known as Storm-Troopers reflects the Shock Guards of the Galactic Empire, obviously with some accommodations to modern day technology and tactics. But one thing they bear in common is motif. The German Nation had a fascination with skull motifs or 'memento mori' which seem to be carried on by ground and aerospace combat units. I went on to explain our FPA troopers, which are more like Airborne soldiers and Rangers from 20-21st Century Earth, namely from democratic type countries.

I probably spoke for an hour I think, with Yang quietly smiling and nodding along as he took out his own flask. He took a sip and I caught a glimpse of him hiding a grimace. He said how all that close quarters fighting is too tiring for him and was glad he's an Admiral instead. "At least I'll die comfortable, and sitting if it ends up happening" he said but "hopes to rather be old and laying on his couch instead if he can help it." We probably spent a good part of the morning talking about military history again, like at home. Once I realized, I said we needed to break camp and get moving. The Lake was about another day's walk out, and I was hoping we could get some distance at least before nightfall. I assured him once we got there we could spend the rest of the week, or he could anyway, lazing about the beach side of the lake. I really need to thank Fredericka and pay her back with more photos. Without the tripod and camera she gave to me as a gift I don't think I would be able to capture the both of us together.

The Memoirs of Job Trunicht

-Important dates-

1 June. 800 UC. This date marked the death of intergalactic rebel and icon Yang Wen-Li, who we members of the free press corps of Heinessen once saw as the symbolic death of freedom and democracy in the universe.

16 December. 800 UC. This date marked the death of our former prime minister, from back when the Free Planets Alliance had just fallen. That traitorous scoundrel continually abused his power, sank his teeth into freedom and brought down the foundations set by the late Ahle Heinessen.

Or so we thought.

Shortly before his death at the hands of another one who was once considered a traitor - Oskar von Reuenthal, I personally asked the former PM for an interview. This interview would mark the last time he'd give any of us any hints whatsoever as to where his true allegiances lay, before his passing.

BY MEI SCARLET . PHOTOGRAPHY BY PYTHIA

-31 October. 800 UC-
Sitting comfortably in his new manner of imperial clothing, Mr. Job Trunicht invites me to his refurbished estate. White, sleek and devoid of any personality or charm, this house reveals nothing of his true colors or interests. I did not expect him to pass me a chai latte of all things, however. Then, the interview began.

Job Trunicht: Take a seat young man! And finish your drink before it gets cold. Or would you rather have some vintage alliance beer? I hear that stuff is difficult to acquire for someone of your stature, even here on Heinessen.

I decline the offer of beer, and after a sip and some small talk, we get down to business.

Interviewer: It's been some time since we last met Mr. Trunicht. I believe it was back during the signing of the Treaty of Barlat?
Job Trunicht: Indeed. What an unfortunate event.
Interviewer: Unfortunate that's the first time we've heard you describe it as such. Many citizens of this na-... This occupied territory
Job Trunicht: Feel betrayed by the Treaty?
Interviewer: Correct. Recent polls show a 77% dismay over the signing of the treaty, with even more citizens still feeling as if you should be tried for treason and abuse of power.
Job Trunicht: Oh? Tell me, Mr. Lonbell, on what charges would I be put on trial?
Interviewer: Involvement with the Terraists, lobbying of key officials, the disastrous alliance struck with the Goldenbaum remnants and your signing of the Treaty of Barlat. Then there are some rumors floating around regarding your involvement with the formation of the PKC as well as your flip flopping stance on how to deal with the - by now - settled galactic war.
Job Trunicht: Hm

The room was shrouded with silent contemplation as an uncanny concern spread over the usually boisterous and high energy former public official sitting in front of me.

Jon Trunicht: I've done my research on you. You're a freelance writer for an Internet publication, you're a laughingstock in the journalistic profession and your family just left you with a mountain of debt.
Interviewer: ...
Job Trunicht: This is no threat, Mr. Lonbell. Don't get me wrong. It is for all of these reasons that I have chosen to confess to my sins, to you alone. Because surely, you'll understand once the funeral bell tolls for me.
Interviewer: Excuse me but what do you mean?
Job Trunicht: Come what may, I'll soon die. My legacy is lost to the winds of time and the last person who could carry it for me is gone. That despicable Yang... had circumstances been any different, I have no reason to believe he wouldn't be willing to cooperate.
Interviewer: ... Go on.
Job Trunicht: I also know you're part of the underground resistance movement. A movement I helped create. The DSF? (Democratie Sans Frontier)

It's built on top of the ashes of the PKC you see, a dummy organisation for the revolution that is to come.

[What followed was a long account of the master manipulator of the times; of Job Trunicht's motivations. To ensure the FPA would survive the coming fiscal year, he ensured that Iserlohn Fortress was taken in order to stop military hostilities on both sides for the foreseeable future. And when urged to fight the Empire, he stood back, choosing to play the long game of economic recovery. Using the PKC, which was leased to him by the Terraists - who thought him no more than a useful tool, he tore down all opposition to his regime in order to ensure the long term stability of his new order. The booming Terraist faction were deceived, made to believe that they themselves controlled Heinessen. And once Mr. Trunicht knew his nation was off the map for Terraist activity, he sold them out to Emperor Reinhart's Galactic Empire to gain a foothold in his new administration. The Goldenbaum remnants were a hassle to deal with for everyone... but not for Trunicht. He respected their right to power on the other side of the universe, their right of sovereignty in spite of their differences of political systems and opinions. He wouldn't forsake the democratic principles of his nation, so at great cost he welcomed them. Just as Yang the hero couldn't pass up on a POW exchange with the late Siegfried Kicheis at the cost of a violent military coup which ended in the destruction of Artemis Necklace on Heinesseb - Job couldn't turn away the child Kaiser.]

[Then there was the Treaty of Barlat. It was the biggest open secret of the former alliance government. Single handedly, Trunicht's decision to capitulate and lay down arms had ended up saving his life. But also the lives of every single citizen in the alliance, as well as the lives of men like Yang Wen-Li and Reinhart von Lohengramm who were just about to annihilate one another. The modern Galactic Heroes. And once the treaty was signed, once he'd ensured the alliance remained somewhat intact (albeit under occupation), he still took responsibility and resigned. He left for Odin, in secret planning the greatest of schemes. The resurrection of intergalactic constitutionalism. The revival of Ahle Heinessen's ideals.]

Job Trunicht: So you see, I intend to make things right. I intend to make good use of that blonde brat's new system to create a stronger foundation for the future of democracy - one that isn't hampered by the same deteriorating circumstances of Heinessen. While I'd intended to use Artemis Necklace to keep Heinessen safe till' the end, the unforeseen circumstance of Yang's destruction of it during the National Salvation Army's coup gave me an idea. One my contemporaries would detest me for, but one which would bring future generations prosperity. A stable, thriving democracy, rebuilt inside the garden of possibility that is the New Galactic Empire. The only potential problem unaccounted for remains the ever elusive Adrian Rubinsky, but Some of my sources tell me he isn't in the best shape.
Interviewer: ...but why would you do all this? Why would you sacrifice so much for democracy alone?
Job Trunicht: Because my will and desires mean nothing when weighed against the future of mankind and its intellectual evolution as a species. What once started out as a bet to see if the FPA would end up choosing someone so devoid of humanity as me to be their leader came to be a wake up call, a realisation if you will. That the FPA system was defunct and malformed, that it needed to be reborn. But not through the burning path of fire and brimstone, that's just the folly of old men who'd rather die than see change speaking. Old fools like Mr. Bewcock.
Interviewer: But why tell me?
Job Trunicht: Because this isn't an interview. Because you understand what it's like to selflessly, without appreciation, fight for the people and their rights. To live in ridicule without true recognition. I'd like you to publish this "interview" as the foreword to my future memoirs, 50 years from now. That should be enough time given for the embers of republican constitutionalism to light a new flame in the hearts of the people, wouldn't you say?

E N D

Afterword: During the decades since his passing, I've wondered back and forth whether or not I should stick to my promise. I've shared this document to a family member or two, but for the rest of the universe I've kept it hidden for the last 50 years, as per his request. The universe is a different place now. It's ripe with potential for change. But... you, the one reading this. You already know, don't you? Within your heart, you know what world came to pass regardless of who brought it forth. The lessons passed down by men like Yang Wen-Li and Job Trunicht, Reinhart von Lohengramm and Paul von Oberstein. The world has changed.

A NEW HORIZON; A NEW LEASE ON LIFE!

"Our galaxy has faced much bloodshed, but now is the time to make peace with this new world we've helped create. To return home."

This sentiment was thoughtfully shared by the renowned subjugator of Terra, Admiral Samuel August Wahlen during a private New Year's celebration we had the chance to intrude on. Our esteemed Chief of Police Admiral Ulrich Kessler gave a simple yet warm smile in return. One served for years on the front line, another in the homeland.

On behalf of his excellency Kaiser Reinhart; the military branch of our great Empire aims to remind all newly returned soldiers what we all ultimately fought for. Whether it's a walk in the park with a loved one or some holiday pastry making with a close friend, always remember that the nation will provide you with the tools necessary to ensure a smooth return back to civilian life.
